The menu of Queen West eating establishments grows with addition of Nana

The new restaurant offers contemporary, street style Thai food.

TORONTO, October 21, 2014 -- As of October 18, 2014, Satanee Nana is officially open for business in the West Queen West neighbourhood of Toronto. Nana is the second Thai restaurant opened by the owner of Khao San Road, a popular Thai canteen in Toronto's Entertainment district. With Nana, the restaurant will be offering contemporary Thai food, in an urban, Thai street-style setting.

"There is so much incredible Thai food to share with the people of Toronto," says Monte Wan, owner and executive chef. "We want to offer patrons exposure to a wider variety of Thai dishes, some which are a bit more adventurous, that the city has not seen."

The idea for opening a second restaurant started in 2012, with the search for an ideal location. Designing and building Nana took place during 2013-2014. Inspiration for the theme and décor were drawn from Wan's time in Bangkok, and realized by designers Dina Sarhane and Anne Van Koeeverden. Eating street food, and capturing the atmosphere were important concepts to bring into the space, which features flooring that resembles a road, and tables and seats much like what can be found in street-style eateries in Thailand's capital.

"A common Thai expression is 'same, same, but different,'" adds Wan. "Khao San Road has been a labour of love, to deliver consistency of high quality, delicious food at a great value. That is also the case for Nana – the same attributes of consistency, quality and value, with a different but equally tasty menu, set to the backdrop of a boisterous, fun atmosphere."

Nana is located at 785 Queen St. W, Toronto, ON. For now, hours of operation are Wednesday-Sunday 6pm-10pm. For more information, visit www.stnNana.com
